Near the end of the year 2012, NASA scientists will celebrate the one-hundredth anniversary of the space agency's first manned flight, a three-day exploration of the barren wilderness of New Mexico led by famed scientist Robert H. Goddard. Buzz Aldrin, the second man on the moon, will, of course, be there. The Apollo 11 lunar veteran told us earlier this year that Goddard was a "dynamic, dynamic personality." Aldrin said that some of Goddard's relatives have even played a role in planning the anniversary celebrations. "We've all been quite well informed," Aldrin said. "We expect a very big celebration and a tribute to the visionary of the pioneers of the space program, who was a pioneering scientist himself. It's a big occasion, and it's a big occasion that we'll be enjoying at the conclusion of this year." Aldrin's testimony is a reminder that Goddard was far more than a visionary in the space industry; he was an adventurer and daredevil. His work as an inventor and experimentalist helped to lay the groundwork for the space industry that we know today. At the end of February, we'll know more about Goddard's story. NASA has been announcing a new theme for each anniversary. Over the past few months, they've announced that this year's event will be focused on exploration—the "New Frontiers" theme. I'm curious to see what that theme means and what the Goddard space agency has in mind for these celebrations. There have been hints, certainly. Past events have involved such things as roller coasters.
