Out of all the places in the world to apply for a job, London's famous finance sector should be the most competitive, but that doesn't mean it won't have its own pitfalls. How to Set Expectations for Your Liability Policy (and Not Get Screwed) Posted on April 30, 2015. Did you know that a typical auto insurance policy does not cover the damage that's caused by your car to other people's property? Liability insurance is specifically designed to cover injuries and property damage caused by your car—not accidents where your car simply hits something. The more dangerous your car, the more you should pay for liability insurance, and the amount you pay typically depends on your age, gender, driving record and other factors. The lower your premiums, the more money you're going to save. However, just as important, you need to make sure you get the most out of your liability insurance. The specifics of a liability policy vary by state and jurisdiction, but the basics are pretty similar everywhere. In most policies, if your car damages someone else's property and you are at fault for that accident, you have to pay. The amount you pay for this damage is determined by several factors, and what is legally considered "fault" will depend on your state and the other person's. 1. Negligence versus Fault In the simplest terms, negligence is when you simply make a mistake and cause an accident. If you are found to be negligent

class Base { public: Base(Derived* d) {...}; ... ~Base() {...}; ... }; class Derived : public Base { ... }

But when I do this, I receive Class type 'class Derived' is not a base class of 'class Base'. error. I suppose the above is not the correct way to do it. What is the correct way of doing it? A: The correct way of doing it is: Derived d(this); ... The constructor of Base::Base(Derived*) is declared as taking a Derived*, so Derived* is the correct type. If Derived has no constructor taking Derived*, you'll
