Flow cytometry analysis of peripheral blood cells of patients with coronary artery disease, type 2 diabetes and obesity. It is widely accepted that obesity and the metabolic syndrome are conditions that predispose patients to the development of atherosclerosis. In addition to the focus on visceral adipose tissue, recent studies also suggest that atherogenic dyslipidemia could be secondary to the modulation of a molecular phenotype in the circulating cells of patients who have metabolic abnormalities, suggesting that a molecular phenotype might exist in the circulating cells. The aim of this study was to define a phenotype in the circulating cells of patients with coronary artery disease (CAD), type 2 diabetes (T2DM), or obesity, and to investigate the relationship between phenotype and the lipid abnormalities. We studied 13 obese patients with CAD, 14 obese with T2DM and 12 non obese controls (C), all undergoing elective coronary angiography. Patients with CAD or T2DM were also matched in terms of age, gender and body mass index (BMI). The phenotypic modifications we evaluated included CD14, TLR2, TLR4, TLR6, CD11c, CCR5, CCR1, VLA-4, MHC II, CD31, CD62L, CD54, CD62P and CD106. There was no difference in the phenotypic expression of any of the molecules evaluated between obese CAD and obese T2DM patients compared to their non-obese counterparts (C) ($p > 0.01$). The classical activation markers (CD14, TLR2, TLR4, TLR6) were not different between obese and non-obese groups. However, the expression of CD11c, CD62L, CCR1 and CCR5, adhesion molecules was found to be up-regulated in patients with obesity (C, T2DM, CAD). These markers were found to be different between obese CAD patients and obese T2DM patients, suggesting that two different phenotypes can be identified in the circulating cells of obese patients with CAD or bff6bb2d33

THE NEW

What I Took This is the biannual wake-up call that, “Ya gotta get up now if ya want to get the time.” I notice that I constantly put off getting up. I’m wasting time sleeping. I don’t workout as much as I should. I’m not eating. Are you starting to see the trend? This is the same man who finds the time to write his blog, play video games, and put up pictures on Facebook. Now, here’s a tip. Not doing the things that you think you need to do is ok. Life would be way too short to do all the things that you think you should do. We all have so much to do right now that we’re just rushing to get it done. Why not just do the easiest and most important thing. Do the things that you’ve been putting off for days. In other words, start sleeping, working out, eating, laughing, and remembering where you parked your car today. Go to sleep and wake up tomorrow and do all the things that you’ve been putting off doing. Question: What’s the worst thing about your current lifestyle and what have you been putting off that you’re really missing out on? Opinions of the United 2005 Decisions
