Stages of Guided Reading. In this stage, students are introduced to the methodology of the Guided Reading Program.Q: ASP.NET pages/controls load very slow with plugins/add-ons We have a website that is basically a grid of data. We have pages that load some initial data and display it. Then they have an add-on like a "load more" button. When the page loads, it immediately goes to work pulling more data for that control. This is very slow, particularly on some browsers. We went out and bought a second box to run it on and it is still running a lot slower. Is there anything in Chrome/Firefox/IE that could be causing this? If you have never used a plugin/add-on, how does it load up/render in your browser? Can we possibly see where the bottleneck is? The load pages/controls are going to take a while, but if we can figure out what is causing it to start so slow, it will make our lives easier. Thanks. A: It's called threading. If you have a significant number of records, you'd probably be better off working on the server-side, as then you can load more records as you scroll, rather than having to synchronize between the client and the server. If you're still concerned about threading, you can disable the add-on. Some advice about threading: You can do this server-side or client-side with Javascript. The Java Script solutions have some real downsides, including the fact that lots of people will have to load the (light) JS stack if they haven't already loaded it. For the same reason that I have said this is a bad idea, I've noticed that when you hit the point at which performance has really taken a hit, you are likely to see a lot of additional processor time taken up by that JS code. This is doubly bad if you're also going to be taking a ton of time to load records or data into the client. Disabling the add-on may slow things down, because then you're going to have to use the add-on's code to get the 6d1f23a050
