The most notable one being the latest from MeGaHeRTZ. After a long and expensive development cycle the final MeGaHeRTZ client for Windows 8 is released. V8 is priced at €119.99 and once again features the usual accolade of a free patch to remove all the protection. The final version of the software also supports the next generation of Internet Explorer. The resources required to create a patch that tries to harvest information from the system makes most malware creators furious with those who can find the bugs and release them in good time. Still, MeGaHeRTZ seem to have placed much more effort into exploiting the mistakes than most. Some time after the mistake, LibertyEMS discovered that its mailing server was taking patches meant for the hackers and sending them out to clients. Knowing the procedure, LibertyEMS had the patches removed and switched to a simple URL to download the patch and install it. The email had failed to contain the URL and the client was running the patch supplied by the hackers. The largest single reason for the appearance of new malware is the appearance of new zero-day vulnerabilities. The problem is that it is extremely difficult to tell when a zero-day is being used because the attacks are so new. It is possible that MeGaHeRTZ did not use a zero-day at all. New versions are only released if they contain a change and in this case it was a patch that failed to contact LibertyEMS, which led to the problems. It is also possible that MeGaHeRTZ planned the attack for a long time. Seeing as how the group are now almost a full year old, they have decided to find new ways to brand themselves in the community. As a result, they have continued to patch the cracks and registry keys of all their products and are releasing new software as a result.
