the peaceful and democratic revolution in czechoslovakia in 1989. the czechoslovakian government, under alexander dubcek, was popularly believed to be planning a new system of government, but was criticised by the soviet union for its liberalising reforms, which challenged the communist party's grip on power. student protests broke out in czechoslovakia following the soviet-led invasion of czechoslovakia on 20 august 1968. by 20 november the protesters had taken control of the government with the creation of the velvet revolution. the negotiations between the communist government and the student protestors which led to the creation of a more democratic system came to be called dubcek's reforms. on 3 october 1968, dubcek announced a change in the communist party's strategy towards the west, and on 14 february 1969 he outlined the new policies for the party at a news conference, announcing that the soviet union would pay an annual $120 million for economic development and that dissidents would be allowed to take part in social and educational programmes. by a decree of 7 february 1969, dubcek adopted a series of measures intended to liberalise the regime: ending the policy of state socialism and allowing trade unions and other independent organisations, and allowing students to hold independent discussions on political matters. he also abolished the requirement for all citizens to be members of the communist party. dubcek, along with other leading figures, were dismissed from office on 5 april 1969. history set in the present is both a challenge and an advantage. the advantage is that young people can read about the world they live in without being frozen into world view. the challenge is that for some students the present can seem frighteningly close and that historic contexts can seem remote. the challenge can be met by doing a study of local history which helps to put a historical context on current concerns. successful history teaching must have a balance between history that is informative of past events and that also engages. the classroom should have a balance of historic sites that are familiar and live, and a collection of real historic artefacts.
