(two) years ago, there was a script in google, just like this, but this one has been developed very well. breathing refers to the process by which humans and other animals take in and expel air, often rhythmically, into the lungs and then expel it from the lungs. bodies of water, including ocean, lakes, and streams, have air. description in humans, breathing may occur in the nose or mouth. air taken in through the nose and inspired air, passes through the pharynx, then through the trachea. air passes through the bronchial tubes and then into the two lungs. the majority of the time, a person breathes rhythmically. if a person breathes rapidly, this is called panting. in the mouth, air is swallowed and then passed through the esophagus, the stomach, and the intestines, before leaving the body through the anus. energy the metabolic cost of breathing is estimated at 3-5% of the total oxygen consumed, which is approximately 3.4 watts per kilogram of body weight. pathology dyspnea (difficulty in breathing) may be caused by inflammation of the lungs, lung cancer, or other abnormalities. asthma may be considered a disease of the lungs. however, it is a disease of the entire respiratory system, not just the lungs. acquired causes pneumonia acute bacterial pneumonia can be a consequence of a viral infection. pneumonia may also be a complication of aspiration of gastric contents into the lungs or of pneumonia in the context of a chronic medical condition, such as congestive heart failure or chronic obstructive pulmonary disease. pneumothorax a pneumothorax is the expansion of the pleural space inside the chest wall by air, causing the collapse of lung tissue. there is a risk of damage to the heart, diaphragm, and nerves, which may lead to shock, and/or death. influenza pneumonia in influenza, as many as 15% of cases can lead to lung damage. the main complications of influenza pneumonia are the complications of acute respiratory distress syndrome. 5ec8ef588b
