The first step to using Photoshop is to open the application, sign in, and log into your Adobe ID. If you haven't used Photoshop before, you can create a free Adobe ID and create a new account. To open the software, click on the icon on your desktop and you will be presented with a new application. You can either have a new document open or create a new one by clicking on the "New" button. You will be asked to choose a name for your new document. Once the new document has been created, you will need to crop the picture you want to edit. To do this, you will need to click on the image area of the document and drag your mouse until it touches the border of your canvas. Don't worry if you don't get an image preview. You can drag your mouse around the canvas to move your picture to the right or left positions. Once you have the picture you want, don't forget to save the new document with a name that you will remember!

I have a few tools that I use regularly for more mundane tasks. The best of these is the "Auto Exposure" Eye Dropper tool. Optical measuring was great when the camera was actually designed for it, but we use these tools now and the Photoshop Eye Droppers work well with both RAW and JPEG files. Localised adjustments can be applied to an image. Mathematically accurate adjustments are not always the best approach to pulling out an image's best features, so a localist adjustment is useful to be able to control local effects. At times, one of the most useful features for photography is the ability to control exposure settings manually. This feature is available in Photoshop, but not in Lightroom, and that drives me nuts. Red Eye is really just one feature of running localised adjustments, but it's a fairly useful one. Other tools can be used or combined, but this can easily be the most useful aspect of software. I have my own way of handling this issue, but I can see other people using Photoshop for processing similar to the way I use Aperture and Lightroom. Although I occasionally manage to get burned, I've never had any Adobe software perform a full domain wipe and reinstall, which you'd see mentioned in other Adobe reviews. My personal system is that the shops I buy from do so through the Adobe shop. Having said that, I've never had any software fail to install, start, or run correctly. I've had trouble installing Lightroom 4 on VirtualBox on my desktop as a test, but that was a product error.

Adobe is always adding new features and refining existing ones to get more people to use its latest and greatest software. Today, it unveiled in a blog post new features that aim to augment the tool that has become one of the most popular when it comes to editing images. The new features, dubbed as “AI-powered filters,” are powered by a deep learning processing technique that breaks down images and allows users to perform more than 3,000 actions on them. They can edit images in any style work, such as painting, layering, and manipulating different elements. Despite the growing popularity of mobile image editing applications, there is still nothing more satisfying than getting back to the sleek and powerful desktop application. The new Photoshop app for both desktop and mobile now interfaces images in a similar way and encourages you to edit images faster. It is also features a bunch of new sharing options. These include easily sending images with commenting and an export feature that allows you to save the changes you made to the original image. Although many users are already going digital these days, there are still photographers that continue to prefer ink on paper. Adobe continues to offer more ways for them to share their work and enjoys seeing them create and photograph their favorite images. To support those users, Adobe added a new experimental feature that uses existing core Photoshop functionality, including tools like Gradient Mesh and Layer Styles, to make it easier to correct mistakes like bleeding or misplaced objects. This will particularly useful for amateur photographers that are at their early stages of trying to complete a photo shoot.
